CHINA AT WAR

抗战到底 保卫领袖

EVERY hand in China honors Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek as the National leader against Japan; from the battle-front to China's farthest borders every man, woman and child is a link in the Nation's defence.

WITHIN this third issue of "China at War" are selections from the daily bulletins of the China Information Committee, Hankow, whose main object has been to present a realistic and truthful picture of the many forces at work in this New China, born in war brought by Japan. Its publishers are of the opinion that the publication of this wartime magazine will alter the conception of many people who may still be labouring under the delusion that China's masses are yet slumbering in this year of bitter war, 1938.

combat with verbal struggles behind the lines in organizing the masses.

However, this does not mean that no Chinese college students or graduates have joined the army. Thousands of them, too impatient to labor in laboratories or lecture rooms, have enlisted in the various branches of the Central Military Officers' Academy. They are now undergoing intensive training and will later be distributed among the military units as junior officers.

In some universities and colleges, military training is also being taught to the students so that if it becomes absolutely necessary, these young men, each of whom represents thousands of dollars worth of investment on the part of the State, can also take an active part in the war.

Harvard Man Runs Refugee Factory

HARVARD-TRAINED Chinese sculptor Teng Kwei whose works are permanently exhibited in various American museums has turned factory-manager out of patriotism to his country. He is now in Hankow supervising the work of hundreds of refugees who are making socks, fans, straw sandals, and towels for Chinese soldiers at the front.

Mr. Teng, who some time ago taught art in Yenching University, an American institution in Peiping, envisages in his present work an interesting experiment, which, if successfully carried out, will go a long way toward rehabilitating China's thousands of hapless war refugees.

The project of which Mr. Teng is now in charge and upon which he is expending his entire efforts, comes under the New Life Movement Association of which Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek is the chairman.

The refugee-workers, mainly women and girls in their teens, work in two improvised factories which were once schools. They receive from twenty to thirty cents a day, which, while insignificant in amount, represent their net earnings, as their lodging places and meals are provided for by local charity organs.

According to Mr. Teng's plan, the experiment will be shortly extended to other cities. In addition to the four articles now being produced, the refugees will be instructed to make under-shirts, gauze and absorbent cotton, all for consumption by the Chinese troops.
